True Education.

Written for the Pacific Commercial Advertiser. All true education is the leading on of the mind from the known to the unknown. For every fresh advance in knowledge we require a foundation of knowledge already there to build upon In arithmetic, for example, we lead a child on from the addition and subtraction of concrete things, of marbles and of apples, to the addition of abstract numbers, to the conception of mathematical little chap to pick up a hot horseshoe for him, and the lad's blisters felt a great deal relations. So in geography, we lead him on from the hills and streams and fields that | cooler when the jury gave him $200 damsurround the schoolhouse, to knowledge of the streams and mountains that define his country, and so on till he can grasp the great truths of physical and political geography. A child has the political knowledge of many things. The great and all important question is how best to enlarge the youthful idea. A man may be schooled and yet not educated. The Passion Play.

There has been a great squable in New York city recently over the proposed public rendition of the Passion Play by Salmi Morse. Attempts have been made to suppress the play by legal procedure, but so far, Morse has triumphed and after many delays, it is probable THE "HAWAHAN CHINESE NEWS," A WEEKLY that the representation of the play on the stage will have taken place before the arrival of the next mail. In order to give our readers some next mail. In order to give our readers some idea of what the Passion Play really is, we abridge the following from the Century for April, on the production of the play at Oberammergau. The representation cannot be considered solely a drama, neither is it to be considered simply as a historical panorama, presenting the salient points in the earthly career of Jesus, called Christ. Whatever there may have been in the beginning of theatrical show and diversion and fantastic conceit about it, has been gradually eradicated. The presentation of the scheme of redemption seeks to portray not only the scenes of the life of Jesus' on earth, but typical foreshadowing of it in the Old Testament narratives. To this end there are given before each act of the play, tableaux of Old Testament events, supposed to be directly typical and intended to be prophetic of the scenes in Christ's life which are depicted in the act following. These are selected with skill and rendered with marvelous effect. For instance, a tableaux of the plotting of Jesseph's brethren to sell him. of the plotting of Joseph's brethren to sell him into Egyptjis given before the act in which the Jewish priests in the full council of the Sanhedrim, plot the death of Jesus. Last Supper | beaten together but very light; one pint of with his Disciples; the sale of Joseph to the milk, one cup of sugar Heat the cream Midianites before the bargain of Judas with the almost to boiling put in the soaked gelatine priests' for the betrayal of Jesus; the death of Abel, and Cain's despair, before the act in which Judas, driven mad by remorse, throws down at the feet of the priests the "price of blood," and rushes out to hang himself; Daniel defending himself to Darius, before the act in which Jesus is brought into the presence of Pilate for trial; the sacrifice of Isaac, before the scourging of Jesus and his crowning with the thorns; these are a few of the best and most relevant tableaux.

The Play is divided into eighteen acts, and covers the time from Christ's entry into Jerusalem, at the time of his driving the moneychangers out of the temple, till his ascension. The salient points, both historical and graphic, are admirably chosen for a continuous representation. In the Second Act is seen the High Council of the Jewish Sanhedrim plotting measures for the ruin and death of Jesus. This is followed by His Departure from Bethany, the Last Journey to Jerusalem, the Last Supper, the Final Interview between Judas and the Sanhedrim, the Betrayal in the Garden of Geth-

The Performance of the Play up to this point consumes four hours; and as there is here a natural break in the action, an interval of an how to break the news to them said-Tell hour's rest is taken. It comes none too soon, either to actors or spectators, after so long a strain of unbroken attention and deep emotion. The next Act is the bringing of Jesus before the High Priest Annas: Annas orders him before Caiaphas, and this is the ninth act of the Play. Then follow: The Despair of Judas and his Bitter Reproaches to the Sanhedrim, The Interview between Jesus and Pilate, His Appearance before Herod, His Scourging and Crowning with Thorns, The Pronouncing of His | isn't engaged yet. Well I'll have to get Death Sentence by Pilate, The Ascent to Golgotha, the Crucifixion and Burial, The Resur-rection and Ascension. The whole lesson of Christ's death, are thus shown, taught, impress-ed with a vividness which one must be callous not to feel. The quality or condition of mind which can remain, to the end, either unmoved or antagonistic is not to be envied. But, setting aside all and every consideration of the moral quality of the Play, looking at it simply as a dramatic spectacle, as a matter of acting, of pictorial effects, it is impossible to deny to it a place among the masterly theatrical representations of the world.
